Egypt Returning to U. S. A Rare $10 Gold Coin

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CAIRO, Feb. 17—What is probably the rarest gold coin in the world, soon will be on its way back to the United States Mint—to be melted down and stored anonymously at Fort Knox.

It is a ten-dollar gold piece that turned up in the collection of Egypt's deposed King Farouk, which is about to go on the auction block.

Gen. Mohammed Naguib, Egypt's President and Premier, ordered the coin withdrawn from the sale and returned to the United States Government.

The coin is unusual because it was never issued. It was one of a set minted in Philadelphia in 1933. Before the coins could be put into circulation, an order withdrawing all gold was issued and the whole new minting was ordered into the melting pot.

It was discovered that nine of the coins had disappeared. Eight of them subsequently were located through rare coin dealers and returned. The ninth was smuggled to France and then to Egypt, where it was bought for Farouk.
