CAIRO STUDENTS WARNED

Egypt No Longer Is Guided by Them, Vice Premier Says

Special to The New York Times.

CAIRO, April 1—University students and teachers, striking against continuation of Egypt's military regime, have been warned indirectly that their protest was powerless and futile.

At Cairo, Ibrahim and Al Azhar Universities students and some members of teaching forces, particularly in the faculty of law at Cairo University, refused to attend classes for the third day. They continued to demand dissolution of the ruling Revolutionary Council and reinstatement of a plan to elect a civilian constituent assembly.

Lieut. Col. Gamal Abdel Nasser, vice premier, speaking yesterday to members of Union of Railway Drivers and Mechanics, which supported the regime in its recent victorious struggle with civilian politicians, said:

"This country with more than 20,000,000 inhabitants has been in its politics guided by a small number of students who follow the interests of the parties and not those of the nation."

But times have changed, he said, and now it was the workers and the peasants who were beginning to assert their rights.
