CAIRO CENSOR CUTS CHEOPS BOAT STORIES

Special to The New York Times.

CAIRO, June 13—A Government censor cut down last night local newspaper articles on the inspection during the day by Premier Gamal Abdel Nasser of the solar boats of Pharaoh Cheops, discovered May 26 by the Government architect and Egyptologist, Kamal el-Malakh.

No explanation was made of the censor's action. There was speculation that it might have been to reduce factional quarreling in the Department of Antiquities over the find. Colonel Nasser's visit to the site at Giza was regarded by many persons as public confirmation of the encouragement and support the Premier had given Mr. el-Malakh at a private meeting two days earlier.

Dr. Herbert Ricke, head of the Swiss Architectural and Archaeological Research Institute here, said today he had been misquoted a week ago as saying the cult of Osiris had not achieved importance until long after Cheops, who ruled about 2750 B.C. Dr. Ricke said he believed the Osiris cult achieved importance in the Fourth Dynasty soon after Cheops' time, but that the sacred city Abydos, in Upper Egypt, had not become a pilgrimage center until long afterward. The theory that the Fourth Dynasty kings made their funerary boats for the Abydos pilgrimage was anachronistic, he said.
