aggression, irrespective of any British-Egyptian agreement on the Suez Canal base.

The assurance was given by Selwyn Lloyd, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, who told the House of Commons the Government intended to stand by the obligations enunciated in the United States-British-French declaration of May 25, 1950. Britain is considering the advisability of proclaiming this intention in connection with the current Suez discussions, he added.

The statement on the tripartite declaration, which also guarantees the frontiers of Israel's neighbors, came as Egypt had turned down several of Britain's latest proposals for settling the impasse over British withdrawal from the Suez Canal zone.

The latest rejection not only has angered the Government but has stirred up suspicion of Egyptian intentions among Laborites and Conservatives. Fears have revived that Egypt intends to attack Israel once the 80,000 British troops are out and British military equipment is left behind.

The House was told a protest had been sent to the Cairo Government concerning Egyptian broadcasts designed to encourage African, including Mau Mau hostility to British colonial rule.
