VOTE NEWS SPARSE IN EUROPE'S PAPERS

LONDON, Nov. 6 (Reuters)—Europeans concentrated on news from Hungary and Egypt today with only a sidelong glance at the United States Presidential elections. They are convinced American policy here will not change drastically, whoever wins.

Most European commentators agreed the election would not make too much difference to affairs this side of the ocean since both candidates are pledged to maintain United States policy in Europe.

Newspapers discussed Election Day, the candidates, the two political parties and such strange terms—to the European ear—as Electoral College and states' rights.

However, most Swiss papers were unable to find space today even for one single line about the elections. Others printed the briefest of reports.

Britain's Manchester Guardian said seldom had there been "a modern Presidential campaign so listless in its opening stages and so obscured in its final week."

It said Adlai E. Stevenson, in the process of trying to blame the present Administration for the present world crises, "has at times seemed to fall into that appeal to national and racial groups among the voters which the Administration has commendably avoided."
